Rallway Travelling in Russin.

We proceeded, bag and baggage, to the station of the Moscow Railway. Only one train starts daily; and the hour at which the most important event takes place is, or ought to be eleven, A. M. Travellers are commanded by the government to be at the station at ten precisely; and even then they are liable to be told that the train is full-as it is quite an unheard of thing to put on an extra carriage for any number of passengers. Having arrived, therefore, at ten minutes before ten, to be quite sure of being in time, our baggage was seized by a soldier, policeman, or railway porter, (for they all wear somewhat the same uniform,) and carried in one direction, while we rushin another to show our passport for Muscow, to procure which we had been to three different offices the day before. Here the descriptions of our persons and our reasons for travelling, which it contained, being copied at full length, we were hurried to another counter, where we got it stamped; whence, catching sight of our baggage en passant, we sped on to the ticket office, and then returning to our portmanteaux, we went through a few formalities, which ended in receiving a ticket to add to the number of those with

The anxiety of mind which such a variety of documents causes is not to be wondered at when the consequences which the loss of them, would entail are considered. Ladies in Russia do not think of trying to carry their tickets in their gloves. We now betook ourselves to the waiting-room, which we should have thought handsome had we not been detained in it so long that we got tired of admiring it. For an hour did the destined occupants of the train sit patiently on the benches, every man with head uncovered-for even a skull cap is an abomination to a Russian under a roof. Every man in military garb seemed to have the entree to the platform, while the doors was rigorously shut against us unhappy civilians. At a quarter before eleven, however, they are opened - a general rush follows, and we are hurried brough a barrier, the doors of which close behind us. Soon the whole barrier becomes thronged with peomatism, Serofula, Eruptions on the Skin, Liver Disease, Fevers, Ulcers, Old Sores, Affections of the Kidneys, Diseases hearts, I should like to know? Where do they all go to? Along with the old moons, I suppose; or they may be keeping company, there's no knowing they may be keeping company, there's no knowing they may be keeping company, there's no knowing the world, the signals for starting, we leave the weeping eyes and waving pocket handkerchiefs For all diseases of the Blood, nothing has yet been found to compare with it. which our pockets were now pretty well filled.

We are to stop here ten minutes, and the people during that time walk up and down the platform and smoke: then we huddle into our old places, and have time to look about us. The carriages are large. Nobody seems to go in the first-class. A second class carriage accommodates about fifty people. They are built as in Austria and America, with a passage in the center, parambulated by a man in uniform, who occasionally asks people for their tickets. He seems to make inquiry the first time to satisfy himself that you have got one, and afterwards merely as an amusement, which he apparently enjoys the more if he fancies you are going to sleep. The men are bearded and dirty, and relate stories in a loud tone of voice, for the benefit of the whole company, most of whom have evidently never been in a railway before. At every station the same scene ensues. The unsmoked ends of the last station's segars having been carefully preserved, are lighted afresh, and vehemently smoked on the platform during five or ten minutes, as the case may be The stations are all very spacious and uniformly constructed with an immense domed building for engines attaching to each. Though there is only one passenger-train daily, there are three goods trains, always well loaded with inland produce, tallow, fur, lea, &c., or with cotton from St Petersburg, to the interior. I should hardly think the line could possibly pay; but as it is a government concern nobody has any means of ascertaining this fact.

In fact, hough the public cannot but be benefited by the formation of railroads throughout a country, it is hardly for the public benefit that railroads are constructed here. Russian railroads seem to be meant for Russian soldiers; and it is the facility thus afforded of moving large bodies of men, that invests this mode of communication in Russia with an importance which does not attach to it in Great Brittan, or perhaps any other country in Europe to an equal extent.
